Hello Gelisa?

Your reflections on the impact of childhood misconceptions about race resonate with the complexities of understanding identity and racism. It's insightful to recognize that children's racial beliefs don't necessarily align with those of their guardians, and the process of growing up often involves confronting and navigating these inconsistencies. Your observation about the challenges adults face in shaping their views on racism and identity, amid societal influences and categorizations, is poignant. The videos' portrayal of the disadvantages faced by African Americans in society sheds light on the systemic issues that perpetuate racial inequality. The concept of color-blind racism, as you highlighted, exposes the subtle ways in which racial views are expressed and inequality reproduced, often masked by a veneer of denial

The questioning of what was taught in school systems is a crucial aspect of self-reflection and societal evaluation. Your inquiry into the origin and reality of race prompts critical thinking about the role of government, leadership, and education in perpetuating or challenging these misconceptions. Your emphasis on education as a means to dispel misconceptions and promote positive reinforcement is noteworthy. Indeed, recognizing that skin color doesn't define us and fostering a broader understanding of shared humanity can contribute to a more inclusive society. Continue engaging with these important discussions, as they are instrumental in challenging and dismantling ingrained beliefs and stereotypes.